President Trump's decision to remove U.S. troops from Syria is playing into Iran's hands, an Iraqi leader said Tuesday. Lt. Gen. Abdul Amir Rashid told the Associated Press that, just days after the U.S. withdraw, Iran has moved more military equipment into Syria and is in the process of constructing infrastructure, including tunnels and bridges. "It's clear that what the U.S. has done is give an opening to Iran to move into Syria and create a power base to work with Bashar Assad," the Iraqi leader said. Lt. Gen. Rashid is the commander of Iraq's joint forces, which oversees operations against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. He told the AP that Iran's "strong presence" on the ground in Syria would be a threat to the stability of the country. Rashid said Iran's move has confirmed his worst fears about the United States' decision to withdraw troops from the country. "The United States didn't listen to us, didn't follow any promises, didn't make a good plan, didn't listen to what we said," he said. "We told them that this is not a good idea to pull out from Syria, and we told them how bad it would be for Syria and Iraq." Trump tweeted Monday that the U.S. is "done" in Syria and that there is no reason for American troops to be there anymore. Trump said the country was "ridiculously costly." Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Joseph Dunford have been in contact with their Iraqi counterparts since Trump's decision to pull troops from the country was announced, senior administration officials told CNN. The Pentagon has long warned that a precipitous withdrawal of U.S. forces from Syria would create a vacuum that could be filled by Iran, Russia
